

You Know You're an Atheist When...

- “God” is something you say on your back, not on your knees.
- You can't decide what to do with your hands or eyes while your family says grace.
- Your old Bible is placed in the “fiction” section of your bookshelf.
- You know more about something you don't believe in than most people who do believe in it.
- To keep the peace in the family, you change the subject of conversation to politics.
- You get angry about people thinking you're always angry.
- You point out to someone that gravity, too, is only a theory.
- You're glad Kirk Cameron is a Christian.
- You have to go out of your way to point out that you're friendly.
- Making it to 11 o'clock church service a few years back was a hassle, but you now arrive at the humanist breakfasts on Sundays at 9:30 a.m. sharp.
- Sex improves your quality of life but your past religious activity makes you ashamed.
- Searching for a higher power involves switching energy companies.
- You have a mental breakdown over what to say when somebody sneezes.
- You get offended if someone asks if being an atheist is like being an Agnostic.
- You begin referring to Zeus in daily conversation.
- The sight of Ramen noodles makes you laugh.
- You give up God for Lent.

This list was created by the readers at FriendlyAtheist.com and edited by Hemant Mehta.

Special thanks to the following commenters for their submissions: micketymoc, Kelly, Wendy, Richard, The Exterminator, Mikel, Infideljoe, nowoo, Liberal Christian Person, Karen, miller, bk

Version 1.0, 6/8/07